The 26th Singapore French Film Festival
For the past 26 years, The Singapore French Film Festival has brought the French language, arts, history, culture and daily lives to audiences in Singapore. This year, action, adventure and documentaries are added to a rich programme which will be kicked off with Luc Besson’s humorous, brave and bold heroine on a quest - The Extraordinary Adventures of Adèle Blanc-Sec - a tale of a quest set in Paris in the years before and after World War I.

Little Nicholas by Laurent Tirard will be screened as the festival’s closing film telling the story of a little boy’s happy existence until it unexpectedly changed forever – his mother is pregnant!

A Tribute to Jean-Pierre Melville
This year’s festival will showcase a collection of works by Jean-Pierre Melville (October 20, 1917 – August 2, 1973), an independent French filmmaker known for his tragic, minimalist film noirs which included The Samurai, 1967 and The Red Circle, 1969.

Award-winning movies which will be screened during the festival include Heartbeat Detector, Welcome, and Summer Hours.

A Brief history of The Singapore French Film Festival
The Singapore French Film Festival was inaugurated in October 1985. It was then known as “La Semaine du Cinéma”. The selection of films presented from 20 to 25 October 1985 did not focus on the latest films being screened exclusively at the Champs-Elysées. Rather, a selection of movies was made from the numerous productions of the three or four preceding years. It represented a general picture, subjective of course, of the French filmmakers of that time. “La Semaine du Cinéma” brought to the island-state French films which had never before been screened in Singapore.

The film takes place before The Great War in Paris 1912. A 136 million year old pterodactyl egg within the museum of natural history hatches and wreaks havoc on the citizens of Paris, and it's up to Adèle Blanc-Sec to investigate and stop it. Adèle has been on a quest to find a doctor to save her little twin sister. She must save a crazy expert who has brought the pterodactyl to life, so he can bring an Egyptian mummy back to life, and it can in turn use ancient magic to revive her sister, who has been dead or in a coma for four years following a bizarre tennis accident. This is a comic imbroglio adapted from the 1970's graphic novels of Jacques Tardi and brought to the screen by Luc Besson.

Luc Besson is perhaps best known in this part of the world for movies such as Nikita, The Big Blue and The Fifth Element. Born on 18 March 1959, he has worked on over 50 films, spanning 26 years, as writer, director, and/or producer. He was nominated for Best Director and Best Picture César Awards for his films Léon (The Professional) and The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc. He won Best Director and Best French Director for his film The Fifth Element.

The following is an extract on an interview with Luc Besson on The Extraordinary Adventures of Adèle Blanc-Sec.

Meeting Jacques Tardi
“I first fell in love with his heroine, Adèle, about ten years ago. I tried to contact Tardi, but unfortunately he had agreed to do Adèle with another director. At the time, I was a bit saddened, but pleased that he had chosen a “great” director and wished him the best of luck. I waited impatiently to see the movie, which never came out. After three or four years, I called Tardi back and he told me he’d fallen out with that particular director and filmmakers in general. He rejected the whole idea of a movie adaptation. I had to convince him to reconsider. We met several times. We needed to reassure him, prove our credentials and wait another year to buy back the rights that his agent had sold to someone else. After six years of waiting and negotiating, Tardi finally agreed to sell me the rights to his Adèle.”

Adapting the comic book
“I wrote the first draft of the adaptation, staying very faithful to the comic book, Tardi’s universe and the underlying characteristics of Adèle Blanc-Sec. I gave my script to Tardi in a state of undisguised anxiety. It was nerve racking in the sense that he wrote the comic book and I had made his character my own by adapting it. But I struck lucky because he read the script and said, “It’s great!” He recognized his comic book and character, and at the same time discovered a film adaptation of them, not just the transposition of his story into moving pictures. That really won him over. The only change he asked for was to the name of one of his characters.”

The actors
“I was very lucky on this shoot. All the actors gave me everything they had and they all contributed so much.”

16-year-old Serguei is a nomadic reindeer herder, one of many who live in the wild mountains of eastern Siberia. Serguei’s clan is led by his father Boris and is made up of four families. Collectively, they own a herd of 3,000 reindeer which they drive from one pasture to another as the seasons change. The main threat is the wolf, for whom the reindeer is a delicacy. From an early age, Serguei has been taught to chase and kill the wolves without pity. But one day, he has an encounter with his ancient lupine adversary that will shatter his certainties. How could he harm the helpless litter of wolf cubs? But Serguei knows that by sheltering and protecting them he will be breaking with thousands of years of tradition, as well as betraying his father and his clan...

Captain Damien Tomaso is framed at home with three kilograms of heroine after a successful mission against the drug lords. The drugs were planted by the police in his kitchen and he is arrested. Meanwhile a group of teenagers film the action of dirty agents led by Roland from the security agency executing policemen in their car and then leaving the car with the corpses in the 13th District to blame the gangs and begin a civil war. Behind these events, the corrupt chief of the security agency Walter Gassman had received a huge amount as kickback from the constructor Harriburton who wishes to construct buildings in the poor area and uses the situation to force the President of France to authorize to destroy five towers in the district. The teenager with the film is hunted by the police but he delivers the memory card to Leito. Damien calls him from the precinct asking for help. The friends team-up with five dangerous bosses to gather evidences to prove to the president that Gassman has provoked the conflict in their district.

Bilal (Firat Ayverdi), a 17-year-old Kurdish refugee, has spent the last three months of his life travelling across Europe in an attempt to reunite with his girlfriend who recently emigrated to England. The journey has been difficult, but the end is in sight when Bilal finally reaches the far north coast of France, where he can literally see the white cliffs of Dover across the English Channel. But it is here that his journey comes to an abrupt halt as local authorities, and the immigration laws they are enforcing, prevent him from going any further. Not content with merely looking upon the country he desires to call his home, Bilal devises a plan to swim across the bitterly cold waters of the Channel, and heads to the local swimming pool to commence his training. It is here that he crosses paths with Simon (Vincent Lindon), a middle-aged swimming instructor with a dejected spirit, who is privately reeling in turmoil as he dreads an imminent divorce from his wife (Audrey Dana). Despite their differing ages, the two men discover that they have much in common, and their friendship develops into a strong bond that will prove necessary for both men to realise their dreams for a happy future. A huge box office success in its native France, writer-director Philippe Lioret (Don’t Worry, I’m Fine) has created an absorbing story that speaks not only of the social issues of the day, but of the very nature of the human spirit.

Simon Kessler works as a psychologist in the human resources department of the French branch of a long established German petrochemical corporation. The firm has recently dismissed 50% of its workforce on criteria devised by Kessler. Rose, the vice-president of the company, requests Kessler to look into whether Jüst, the CEO, is fit to do his job. The CEO discovers that Kessler is investigating him and tells him that Rose, whose previous name was Kraus, has a Nazi past. Kessler then discovers that Jüst’s father headed a Nazi extermination group on the Eastern Front during World War Two. Jews placed in the back of a closed truck were killed with the truck’s exhaust gas. A device called a “heartbeat detector” was then applied to discover any survivors. During the investigation, Kessler’s perception goes disturbingly chaotic and cloudy. The experience affects his body, his mind, his personal life and sensibility. The calm assurance he is famous for starts to falter. Tormented by the memory of mass murder, Jüst attempts suicide. From company politics, the film changes its focus to the Holocaust. An analogy is drawn between company downsizing and extermination.

Jeanne is a young woman, striking but otherwise without qualities. Her mother tries to get her a job in the office of a lawyer, Bleistein, her lover years ago. Jeanne fails the interview but falls into a relationship with Franck, a wrestler whose dreams and claims of being in a legitimate business partnership Jeanne is only too happy to believe. When Franck is arrested, he turns on Jeanne for her naivety; she's stung and seeks attention by making up a story of an attack on a train. Is there any way out for her? In a subplot, Bleistein's grandson, Nathan, prepares for his bar mitzvah and, through an encounter with Jeanne, experiences intimations of manhood.
Khamsa is the story of a half-Gypsy, half-Arab street kid, Marco, 11 years old, who is also otherwise known as Khamsa. He comes back to his camp after an umpteenth runaway. He gets the name "Khamsa" from the Hand of Fatima necklace he wears around his neck - his only keepsake from his Algerian mother who has passed away. As a member of not just one, but two despised ethnic groups, Marco occupies probably one of the lowest social rungs in French society. He re-bonds with his long time friends and cousins. They plunge into the fragile world of thefts, scams and violence. They make money out of the financial system. Marco and his friends are not protected by the police. They do not go to school. They dream of dogfights and burning caravans.
Hélène is a family matriarch of a small town who has devoted her life to preserving the legacy of her artist uncle. However, while her eldest son, Frédéric, wants to preserve her home after her passing, she harbors no such illusions as she prepares her legacy. After her death, her children realize what she anticipated as they come to terms with their inheritance's place in their own lives. In the resulting disposition of their mother's assets, treasured heirlooms of a romantic family past drift away even as their changing modern world confronts the value of their memories.

LE CHANT DES MARIÉES

Tunisia, 1942. Nour and Myriam, 16 years-old, are childhood friends. They share the same house in a modest district where Jews and Muslims live in harmony. Each one desires the life of the other: where Nour regrets not going to school like her friend, Myriam dreams of love. She envies Nour’s engagement to her cousin Khaled, kind of a shared fantasy of Prince Charming. Unfortunately, Khaled does not find a job. The engagement is prolonged and the prospect of a union slips further away. In 1942, the German army enters Tunisia. Following the politics of Vichy, the Nazis place a heavy fine on the Jewish community. Tita, Myriam’s mother, no longer has the right to work. Crippled by debts, she decides to marry off her daughter to a rich doctor. In one stroke Myriam sees her dreams of love fade away…
A girl in her twenties tries to bring a little light and levity to her life that she finds inadequate, futile and lacking in the intensity that she requires. She decides to give her love—not to the most seductive guy, nor the most deserving or most admirable one. No, they don't need her. She will give her love to just anybody.
Djamila, Ana Maria, Zoé and the others; Anne, Marta, Pierre are a group of women struggling with their sexuality. They all meet in ‘God’s offices’, or in less metaphysical terms, in the premises of the Family Planning centre. The former are women or teenage girls who have trouble with their sexual lives; the latter are counselors or doctors, who support and help them when families, partners or even the whole society tend to complicate matters. They speak openly with the female counselors who wonder if such a thing as “sexual freedom” is truly possible. This story speaks of the incredible hidden aspects of mundane events.
Manu, a gay pediatrician in his forties, would be perfectly happy if he could adopt a child and bring him or her up with his partner, Philippe, a lawyer. However, Philippe is pleased with his present life and the last thing he wishes for is the invasive presence of a wailing brat. Unable to come to a compromise, the two lovers part. Though heartbroken, Manu focuses on finding a surrogate mother who would be willing to carry his child. Fina, a beautiful illegal immigrant from Colombia might do the job for him in exchange for a marriage of convenience.

Ely and Lila are as close as sisters. They have known each other since their childhood – they share everything and dream of a different life together. They live in the same suburb ten minutes away from Paris. They tell big lies and get into scrapes – they do everything in order to try and go into a world which is not theirs, where everything seems possible. But everything that glitters is not gold. The film is a charmingly warm and studied portrait of two saucy young ladies who sacrifice friendship to penetrate the elitist realm of Paris’ upper classes. Both chick-pic-with-a-heart and socially smart dramedy, this debut effort from scribe-helmers Géraldine Nakache (who also co-stars) and Hervé Mimran is packed with wit and youthful energy.

Welcome to Timpelbach, a small, serene village. Well, not really that serene... Indeed, for several weeks, the children have been playing multiple practical jokes and nasty tricks. The victims are, of course, other children... but also, and most of all, the parents. Overwrought, they decide to leave the village for what they think will only be one day. But nothing happens as planned: on the way back, they are taken prisoner by a group of soldiers. In Timpelbach, the news of a village without parents makes Oscar and his gang of thugs happy! But that isn’t the case of a few daredevils who decide to side with Manfred and Marianne to regain control of the village.
Rock 'n' roll...of Corse! charts the musical journey of Henri Padovani, guitarist, co-founder of The Police with Stewart Copeland. The young 24 year old Corsican arrived in London in December 1976. Actor and witness of a period when the alternative and revolutionary trend, the punk movement, arose, this self taught guitar player went through the 80’ like a meteorite falling from nowhere. From The Police he founded with Stewart Copeland in January 77, until his reunion on stage thirty years later in front of 80,000 people, from The Clash to the Sex Pistols, from The Who to The Pretenders, from REM he signed up to Zucchero whom he manages, with everyone, Henri shared a little bit of their music and a lot of their lives. This documentary features rare footages of The Police as well as interviews with band's members and other stars.
Jean-Pierre Melville’s films are steeped in tragedy and confront the darker side of human nature. Influenced by American cinema, his films glamourised weapons, clothes and especially hats. Yet the recurring themes in all his films are neither violence nor crime – the themes are that of loyalty to one’s comrades and a self-imposed code of honour.

The 26th Singapore French Film Festival pays tribute to Jean-Pierre Melville, a major influence on the French New Wave film movement and considered to be the godfather of the modern French gangster film and film noir.

Jean-Pierre Melville, born Jean-Pierre Grumbach on 20 October 1917 to a family of Alsatian Jews in Paris, served in World War II and was part of the French Resistance. This is when he took on the name of Melville, in tribute to the famous American novelist. He became an independent filmmaker when his application for a license to become assistant director was refused, something he attributed to party politics. He decided to direct his films by his own means. He set up his own film production company in 1946, with a studio in Paris, the famous Studio Jenner, which gave him total independence, something many film-makers were dreaming of but never dared to do.

Melville’s earlier successes include Le silence de la mer (Silence of the Sea, 1947), a highly innovative and intimate piece on the horrors of World War II. It was the adaptation of the eponymous novel written in early 1942 by Jean Bruller under the codename Vercors which had been published secretly in Nazi-occupied France and had quickly become a symbol of mental resistance against German occupiers. Melville used unknown actors and the filming was done by a skeleton crew. Its dark, claustrophobic sets and bottom-lit close-ups heralded the setting for a new style of cinema.
He first stepped into the underworld with Bob le Flambeur (Bob the Gambler) a crime thriller which set the style that will later be adopted by the New Wave directors in their thrillers of the 1960s.

Melville gained critical acclaim with Léon Morin, Prêtre (The Forgiven Sinner, 1961), an intense drama that explores the sexual tension between priest and parishioner, with an uncommonly forthright approach for the early 1960s. Melville’s detailed, observant portrait instills the film with a unique credibility, and his leading man Belmondo gives a sexy, charismatic performance that enhances the film’s thematic disparities. Léon Morin is also uncommon for the early 1960s in its zealous case against anti-Semitism. Few films before or after have examined spirituality and religion in so convincing a manner, and Melville established a reputation as a serious director.

That next year he made Le Doulos (The Finger Man, 1962), another gangster movie in which his trademark technique of filming and storytelling became even more personal. Quentin Tarantino famously called Le Doulos his “favourite screenplay of all time”.

In 1967, he made his most well-known film, Le Samouraï (The Samurai). This film is classic Melville and once again places loyalty and the code of honour before everything. His own experiences in the resistance featured heavily in his next film, L’Armée des ombres (The Army of Shadows, 1969). Presenting a bleak, unromantic view of the French Resistance, it was hailed as his greatest cinematographic achievement and it remains as one of the greatest French movies about World War II.

Le Cercle rouge (The Red Circle, 1970) considered by many to be the ultimate crime thriller, brought together no less than three acting legends of French cinema (Alain Delon, Yves Montand and Bourvil).

Jean-Pierre Melville’s career spanned a period of 25 years. He made 14 full length films which were regarded as genuine triumphs of French cinema. He died of a heart attack in 1973 at the age of 55. Aside from Jean-Luc Godard and François Truffaut (famous French New Wave directors), celebrity directors such as John Woo, Quentin Tarantino, Michael Mann, Volker Schloendorff, Johnnie To and Martin Scorsese have pointed to him as a key influence.

France, 1942, during the German occupation - Philippe Gerbier, a civil engineer, is one of the French Resistance's chiefs. Given away by a traitor, he is interned in a camp. He manages to escape, and joins his network at Marseilles, where he ensures the execution of the traitor... The film shows rigorously and austerely the everyday-life of the soldiers of the French Resistance: their solitude, their fears, their relationships, the arrests, the forwarding of orders and their carrying out...
BOB LE FLAMBEUR

In Paris’s Montmartre district, everyone knows Bob, a middle-aged, well-dressed compulsive gambler. He’s generous, moralistic, drives a two-toned convertible coupe, lives in a swank apartment, and has the respect of the police. But he’s on a losing streak, and even when he hits it big at the track, he loses at the Deauville Casino. He hears through a friend that the Deauville Casino holds undreamed-of quantities of cash, vulnerable in the early morning hours. Bob develops a complicated scheme to steal it, bringing in a tough but naive young protégé and an ace safecracker into his scheme, along with a few other underworld characters.

Corey is a cool, aristocratic thief, released from prison on the same day that Vogel, a murderer, escapes from the custody of the patient Mattei, a cat-loving police superintendent. Corey robs Rico, his mob boss, then enlists Vogel and an ex-police sharpshooter, Jansen, in a jewel heist. While Corey is harried by the vengeful Rico, Mattei pressures Santi, a nightclub owner and pimp, to help him trap the thieves. Over all hangs the judgement of the police director, that every man is guilty.
Burglar Maurice Faugel has just finished his prison sentence. He murders Gilbert Vanovre and steals the loot of a break-in. He is also preparing a house-breaking, and his friend Silien brings him the needed equipment. But Silien is a police informer. The police appear and he tries to run but the police shoot at him and he is wounded. He loses consciousness and awakes in his friend Jean's apartment. He believes that his friend Silien told the police about his plans. Silien is questioned by the police about the murder of Gilbert and the robbery before the police collect Maurice from a bar where he is reading a newspaper report about his girlfriend, Therese's death. Therese has been found in her car at the bottom of a quarry. Silien is released and goes to meet his ex-girlfriend Fabienne. With Fabienne's help, Silien frames someone else for the murder and robbery, leaving Maurice in the clear. Maurice is released from prison and discovers that it was Therese who told the police about the robbery and Silien and Jean who killed her. Maurice reveals that he killed Gilbert because Gilbert killed his girlfriend Arlette four years ago to keep her quiet. Silien returns home but once Silien has left, Maurice remembers that he hired a man to kill Silien because he thought he had betrayed him and chases after him. Through Maurice and Silien's actions, the film explores just how deeply qualities such as friendship and loyalty run.
In a small town in occupied France in 1941, the German officer, Werner Von Ebrennac is lodged in the house of the uncle and his niece. The uncle and niece refuse to speak to him, but each evening the officer warms himself by the fire and talks of his country, his music, and his idealistic views of the relationship between France and Germany. That is, until he visits Paris and discovers the reality of the occupation.
Combining interviews of Johnnie To, Masahiro Kobayashi, Volker Schlöndorff, Bertrand Tavernier and others with rare archival footage of Jean-Pierre Melville himself and extracts of his films, Code Name: Melville shows how Melville’s works were impacted by what he experienced as a young man during World War II, and how it structured his whole approach to cinema, not only in its thematic but also in its aesthetics. Indeed, Melville spent a total of eight years of his life (1937-1945) in the French army and then escaped through the South of France to Spain, to join the Free French Forces. Although his family name was Grumbach, as a Resistance fighter, he adopted the name of Melville (after Herman Melville), and would never go back to his original family name, remaining as Melville throughout the post war years. Significantly, his first feature film was the adaptation of one of the most prestigious novels written about the French Resistance, The Silence of the Sea. Twenty years later, he directed what still remains as the ultimate movie about the French Resistance, Army of Shadows. Resisting the structures of the film industry, his own original approach to filmmaking was that of a highly independent man who did not want to have to rely on any existing system or network. This attitude earned him the reputation of being the precursor of the French New Wave.

Born in Marseilles (France) in 1972, Olivier Bohler completed his PhD thesis on Jean-Pierre Melville in 2000. He has also written numerous articles for books and magazines about various aspects of the history of French cinema. Since 2005, Olivier has been writing scripts for films and TV series in France. In 2007, he co-founded Nocturnes Productions with Raphaël Millet. Code Name: Melville is his first full length documentary. Olivier is currently working on a documentary about Jean-Luc Godard’s relationship to modern and contemporary art.
For Nicholas life is perfect: loving parents, terrific pals and no desire for anything to change. Then an overheard conversation leads him to believe his mother is pregnant. He imagines the worst: his parents will no longer have time for him. Maybe they'll even abandon him. Something has to be done.

Nicholas and his gang come up with all kinds of plans - plans that lead them into increasingly crazy adventures...

Le petit Nicolas (Little Nicholas) is a French children's book which started out as a cartoon in Moustique, a weekly Belgian publication. It was created by René Goscinny and illustrated by Jean-Jacques Sempé. It was published for the first time in 1959. Nicholas is an illustration of an ideal childhood and a nostalgic memory of the 1950s.

The following is an extract on an interview with Laurent Tirard on Little Nicholas.

How was the project born?
“Marc Missonier and Olivier Delbosc, the producers, wanted to adapt Little Nicholas and they thought I was the right person for it. They contacted me. It didn’t begin as a personal project but quickly became one. I grew up with Little Nicholas. I read it as a teenager. The books are relevant to me, they talk to me. I immediately knew what the film would look like.”

What were your links with LITTLE NICHOLAS?
“Little Nicholas is universal, everyone can relate to him. He sent me back to my own childhood – even if it took place in a different era. He made me laugh, with a hint of nostalgia. I like the second degree – one level for children, one level for adults. Little Nicholas is also poetic. The scene where he decides to leave home at night with his bundle really struck me – I had planned to do the same thing myself! I even got as far as a few hundred meters! And later it became an example: if I was angry I’d threaten to leave with my suitcase, using the same line as Little Nicholas: “I’ll come back one day with tons of money and everyone will feel really awful”. It was a way of not taking myself too seriously.”

What made you the happiest during this experience?
“There are lots of positive points. From a personal point of view I have the feeling that it is getting easier for me to tell a story. I don’t know if this is due to the fact that I know more what I want, or because I struggle less and less to obtain it, but I feel more serene. I feel more in synch with what I’m doing and what I feel. I ask myself fewer questions, I feel less anxious. This doesn’t mean my two preceding films were painful, but it seems that I simplify things in a positive way. I need fewer shots to reassure myself for example. I tend to simplify.”
