SYNOPSIS

A CANTONESE OPERA TELLS THE TRAGEDY OF THE JADE EXECUTIONER, WHO HAD CREATED A POISON THAT KILLED BY GIVING THE ULTIMATE PLEASURE. THIS LEGEND HAPPENS AGAIN NOWADAYS WHEN A FRENCH WOMAN ESCAPES TO HONG KONG AFTER HAVING KILLED HER LOVER TO TAKE AN ANTIQUE HOLDING, THE INFAMOUS POTION. SHE BECOMES THE HAND OF FATE THAT PITS A TAIWANESE GANGSTER AGAINST AN EPICUREAN WOMAN MURDERER WHO SEES HERSELF AS A NEW INCARNATION OF THE JADE EXECUTIONER.

DIRECTORS' NOTE OF INTENT

“ Les Nuits Rouges du Bourreau de Jade ”. “Red Nights Of The Jade Executioner”. The French title reminds of double bills cinemas that screened Italian “Gialli” and Chinese “Wu Xia Pian”. The end of the 60s, when genre and exploitation cinema gave us transgressive and deviant pictures, filled with revenge crazed heroes and luscious femme fatales that fueled the fantasies of little boys. We were those little boys.

Our film however is not a nostalgic homage, nor is it a detached and ironic take on these genre films we grew up with. “Red Nights” was made to be a stylish thriller build upon defining elements and moods we love in this particular kind of films, without being a catalog of quotations.

Even though we play with this heritage, the film is built to be enjoyable as it is, from a first degree of vision down, without needing any knowledge of the references we play with.

The project originated from the idea to transpose a traditional “Giallo” intrigue in a Hong Kong context. Maybe because we discovered them at the same time, we have always felt strong connections between Italian and Hong Kong genre films. The same capacity to provide entertainment and rule their respective markets in the 70s, the same recreation of deviant and revolutionary genres, from a baroque restructuration of the “whodunit” that would give birth to the Italian “Giallo”, to the gory romantic swordsmen fantasies of Hong Kong. Despite these similarities however, and a common taste for exploitation, these cinemas never really connected with each other.

But one just needs to wander at night along the mid-levels lanes on Hong Kong island, a maze of stairs and narrow streets connecting ancient theatres, temples and high tech buildings with silent mansions hidden among the trees up along the peak, to know this is a perfect playground for a maniac killer in trench coat hunting attractive but terrified victims “à la Mario Bava”.

Our intention was not to copy a “Giallo” and all its elements, but put ourselves in the same creative constraints of budget and locations transcended by a strong visual style and delicious as well as memorable perversions. We wanted to revive the twisted plots and the bloody operatic style of these Italian films in this new context. Here we could structure them around Hong-Kongese archetypal characters but with a visual treatment closer to Japanese genre films of the 60s that would integrate actual (Cantonese) opera to formalize some parts of the story.

And above all, we wanted to use Hong Kong like a feminine and mysterious beauty, a luscious background for a confrontation between exceptional and fascinating women.

CARRIE NG

BIOGRAPHIE

One of the most beloved actresses of contemporary Hong Kong cinema, Carrie Ng has become over the years a prominent figure of the territory's New Wave, appearing in many of the films that redefined genre cinema for the whole world. Her breakthrough happened in 1988, when she was nominated at the Hong Kong Film Awards as Best Supporting Actress for her smashing performance in Ringo Lam's "City on Fire", the heist thriller that would later inspire Tarantino's "Reservoir Dogs". After that film, she worked with the most talented Chinese directors of the time, including Kirk Wong, Tsui

Hark, Chu Yuan and Taiwanese New Wave master Edward Yang. She gained fame in the West for her flamboyant performances in Category III films (violent B-movies locally rated +18) that took Hong Kong by storm at the end of the eighties, with titles like "Sentenced to Hang" (1989, the first film to get the Category III rating) and "Naked Killer". In 1993 Carrie won the Taiwan Golden Horse for Best Actress for her performance in Clarence Fok's "Remains of a Woman" and in 1999 got the Hong Kong Film Award for Supporting Actress for her part in Jacob's Cheung drama "The Kid".

CARBON & COURTIAUD

BIOGRAPHIE

Julien Carbon and Laurent Courtiaud met in 1990 and helped through their work for several movie magazines French audiences know more about modern Asian cinema and especially Hong Kong films. In 1995, while Laurent was teaching screenplay to film adaptation at Louis Lumière National Film School and Julien worked for Jean-Pierre Dionnet with film acquisition they decided to write films, then later become directors.

In 1996 one of their screenplays, “Psionics” (a story about the department of paranormal affairs in mainland China) was bought by Tsui Hark who invited them to come and work with him in Hong Kong at Film Workshop, his company. This screenplay was followed by development work on many projects like a Godzilla for Toho and adaptations of Japanese comic books such as Golgo XIII and Lupin III. Through these years of training along Tsui Hark, Carbon and Courtiaud settled in Hong Kong and explored the many faces of the city.

In 1998 Johnnie To, who was producing stylish cop stories in the tradition of those by John Woo or Ringo Lam hired Laurent and Julien to write a mainstream thriller as a vehicle for the biggest local star, actor singer Andy Lau. The film, “Running Out Of Time” went on to be a major Box office and video hit and gathered a large number of awards, among them best screenplay and the Best Actor award that had until then eluded Andy Lau throughout his long career.

The success of the film allowed Carbon and Courtiaud to work in a different way on their next four screenplays and write “on and from the field”. While working on an original screenplay for Wong Kar-wai, they became part of the “In The Mood For Love” production crew and were sent to Cambodia to prepare for the film’s shooting in Angkor. For Kit Wong’s Black Door, a horror film shot in Canada, they wrote the script and worked on location in Vancouver. Then they flew to meet Tsui Hark in Bangkok and assist him on the set during the filming of “Black Mask II”. After this they were hired by Michelle Yeoh to write “The Touch”, a collaboration that would send them through China and to Tibet where they worked at the foot of the Potala palace. To paraphrase one of their models, Hunter S. Thompson, it was the beginning of “Gonzo Screenwriting”.

Since that time, they have also written an adaptation of the Capcom video game “Onimusha” for Davis Films as well as a transposition of the Tristan and Isolde’s story in Ancient China as a lavish Wu Xia Pian. They were also hired as script and dialogues consultant for “Red Steel”, an adventure game produced by Ubisoft for the Wii Nintendo Console.

In 2007, along with their long time partner Cantonese director Kit Wong, they set up a Hong Kong based production company, Red East Pictures, and a creative label, The Ubiks, and invested in a RED digital camera. They aimed to use their international experience and their access to talented Hong Kong crews to develop internationally financed genre films with a unique Asian touch and a worldwide appeal.

“Red Nights” is the first product of this system, a film with a distinct style, shot on digital format with the highest technical requirements with a mixed Hong Kong, Taiwanese, French and Belgian crew cast and financing.

As “Red Nights” begins to appear in festivals worldwide, starting with Toronto International Film Festival, Julien and Laurent are already entering pre-production for their new project “3 Days Away”, a romantic thriller set in Hong Kong with a western cast.
